

Introduction:

As past instructors of first year design students, developer of design programs for high school students, and owners of a professional studio focused on architecture and design, we have witnessed a need for educational opportunities that can give motivated high school students a 'bridge' to more focused and rigorous thought needed at the college level and beyond.

Design Plus Education is offering a Saturday Studio for high school students that will give a sample of concepts, history, and techniques that are helpful when entering college design programs, while in a relaxed setting. The course is part introduction and part exploration, it is intended to be rigorous enough to give students a true sample of what they will experience in design school, but is intended to help develop analytical skills at a relaxed pace and start, or build upon, a student's portfolio of work.

There will be drawing, model building, and reading exercises intended on creating a strong foundation to carry students through high school and their first year of design school. Further opportunities include scholastic design competitions and an introduction to design software such as Sketch Up in future studio offerings.
